Keynote Title: “Facilitating autobiographicity to promote gifted and talented learners' self-designing and career construction”

Abstract: Connecting conscious knowledge with subconscious insights

An exponential increase in the rate of change forces people to deal with repeated transitions at all levels of their existence. These transitions are often difficult to handle and give rise to feelings of vulnerability and concern. Events such as the recent economic meltdown, major changes in the global economy, and the impact of the Covid-19 pandemic in particular, have given rise to downsizing, retrenchments, rising unemployment, as well as insecurity and uncertainty at all levels – prompting spiralling unemployment rates globally.

The developments delineated above call for a strong response from theoreticians, researchers, practitioners, and policy makers. This paper explicates the theory and conceptual framework underlying an innovative, integrative (qualitative+quantitative) approach to (career) counselling for gifted and talented learners. This approach aims to help gifted learners connect what they know about themselves consciously with what they are aware about themselves subconsciously.

The paper explains that, globally, millions of gifted and talented learners have never been given a fair chance in life to design themselves and choose and construct their careers meaningfully. These learners (from across the diversity spectrum) may have made substantial contributions to humankind. The world may have lost the likes of a Mother Teresa, a Mark Savickas, an Albert Einstein, a Sigmund Freud, a Nelson Mandela, a Kofi Annan, or so many other luminaries.

Lastly, this paper shows how learners’ ‘stories’ (information obtained from qualitative approaches) can be blended with their (test) ‘scores’ (information obtained from quantitative approaches (test ‘scores’)). Achieving this aim can help (career) counsellors identify giftedness and talent and help learners experience or rekindle a sense of meaning, hope, and purpose in their lives and contribute to positive transformation and societal advancement globally.
